A novel species of taxation proposed by Mr. Goschen, the English chancellor of the exchequer, is to place a duty of five dollars on every pleasure horse and twenty-five dollars on every race-horse. There is no country in which such a tax could be more easily borne than England, or where the revenue would be larger from such a source. All the race-horses, and there are a great many of them, are owned by rich people. No others can afford such a luxury, where pleasure, and not gain, is the chief object of racing. The owners of pleasure horses are no more than a small category.

GEN. BOULANGER is placed on the retired list by the decision of the tribunal called to consider his case, and thus he is removed from any active participation in the military affairs of France as long as the present government is in power. But we expect to hear from him again. The note which he received in the department of the Alsace last Friday is highly significant of his popularity with the people. The government will not be able to put him down. Another battle is necessary in the department of the Alsace, and when it is had, Gen. Boulanger will undoubtedly be triumphantly elected. The result of that is hard to forecast, but it may be very serious for the French people.

Mr. Goschen's budget, which he introduced into the house of commons Monday in a four hours' speech, awakened great enthusiasm among the adherents of the government, and drew from Mr. Childers a commendatory remark. It was the most encouraging statement of British finances presented to the house of commons for a long time. Mr. Goschen has very materially added to his reputation as a great financier by his debt conversion scheme and the budget just presented. The Tories will, of course, take all the credit that will arise from the wise measures proposed and executed by Mr. Goschen. The Liberals are compelled to stand by and see one of their own party contributing to the popularity and success of their opponents. The issue of home rule has created a strange and apparently unnatural state of affairs in England. It is regrettable that so able a man as Mr. Goschen should even be temporarily estranged from the party in which he grew to fame and from which he derived his greatest lessons in statesmanship.

The French chamber of deputies has agreed by a vote of 360 to 170 to consider the proposal to authorize the Panama Canal Company to issue a loan. Those who have been so ready to foretell the ruin of the Panama canal scheme have at least been premature. There are no signs of its imminent dissolution. On the contrary, the company has just received $10,000,000 fresh money from the sale of new obligations. France is a very rich country. There is more money among the French people than among the people of any other nation in the world. They are not only a well-to-do people as a whole, but they have maintained national pride. Great sacrifices will be made before the Panama canal is abandoned. Americans are naturally jealous of such an undertaking because it is being prosecuted by a foreign country, and for that reason we may do the courage and perseverance of the French in justice in the present instance. If De Lesseps should live a few years longer the canal is pretty certain to be completed, and even if he were to die the French government would probably assume the responsibility of seeing the work through.

Republicans Stand Firm.

The New York Tribune yesterday had a lengthy editorial referring to the efforts of the administration to secure the passage of the Mills tariff bill, which concluded as follows: "Whatever happens, it is to be expected that Republican members of Congress will do their best to defend the industries of the country. Not one of them can afford to share responsibility for results to which fat offices may make some Democrats indifferent. The course of the Republican party in the next presidential contest will be ineffectual; that is certain as if the platform had already been adopted. It will appeal to the country against this measure, and necessarily against those who fail to do their best to defeat it. The real method of defeating it is not of the highest importance. It is not the duty of Republicans to frame a tariff until the country entrusts them with that responsibility. But they will not fail to see what power they have. If their united vote will effect a repeal of the tobacco taxes and part of the duties on the sugar duty, with provision for encouragement of home production, they will be heartily sustained by constituents in disposing of the surplus in that way. But they have no intention to vote themselves, if the majority gives them no chance to propose or carry anything and insists upon tariff reduction or no reduction of taxes. Republicans can afford to go to the people on that issue."

A Desperate Game.

The work of proselyting among Democratic members of Congress who are opposed to the Mills free trade bill is in full force and somewhat successful. The latest paragraph in the "Republican" have been written by news from the white house is Mr. Erannout, one of Mr. Randall's most faithful Pennsylvania. Mr. Erannout wants a re-nomination, and nearly all the officers in his district have been reformed; they are active for Mr. Cleveland and his policy; they will be active for the member whom Mr. Cleveland favors. Therefore Mr. Erannout trout "comes down upon a hint that he is wanted."

Rumors are rife relative to other members who are known to dislike the free trade bill. Two or three New Yorkers whom Mr. Randall counts among his adherents are said to be shaky. There is a great deal of patronage in New York city available for collection purposes. A pressure is bearing upon one or two Ohio members also, and the same "influences" are working in other places where conviction is supposed to lack courage.

No developments in this work of conversion need surprise the public. The free traders are desperately in pursuit of success for their Mills scheme to smash the tariff, and desperate measures will be used to promote it.

The death of ex-Gov. Dorsheimer, of New York, removes a man who has cut a conspicuous figure in the politics of his state, and who has more recently obtained some standing in journalism through his connection with the New York Star. He was rewarded for his services to Mr. Cleveland in the campaign of 1884 by an appointment to be United States district attorney for the district including the city of New York, but he was unfortunate in the discharge of some of the duties that devolved upon him in that station, and resigned after a few months' service. Previous to his appointment he had undertaken the task of reviving the Star, a paper that had enjoyed a career of almost unvarying hard luck under the indirect management of John Kelly. It had been in a state of suspension for some time before Gov. Dorsheimer took it. It is generally known to be a fact among New York journalists that he was influenced largely in this venture by a personal quarrel of great bitterness that had sprung up between him and Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, of the New York World. When Mr. Pulitzer went to New York to buy the World from Jay Gould he and Dorsheimer were on terms of great intimacy, and had been for several years. Gov. Dorsheimer acted as Mr. Pulitzer's attorney in all the transactions pertaining to the purchase of the World, and was his confidential adviser in many important matters. But one day there came a disruption of these intimate relations. It was bitter and permanent in its character. Some of the dearest of the many fierce philippics ever printed on the editorial pages of the World were leveled at Dorsheimer. As soon as he got the Star he began to return the fire, and it seemed to be the controlling passion of his life to break down Pulitzer. The war between the two was such as has seldom been seen in American journalism, and the people of New York would not have been surprised to hear any day that the two men had met and shot each other to pieces. And now a quarrel of unexampled malignity has come to an end in death. It had practically ceased some time before, through the illness of Mr. Pulitzer, who is now in southern California trying to save his eyesight from total destruction.

COL. WILLIAM HENRY MARPLESON, inventor and original proprietor of Her Majesty's Opera Company, is resourceful if nothing else. No man or set of men, or woman or set of women, have yet been known to be so colonized in a corner from which he could not in some way make his escape. The latest illustration of his adaptability to the emergency of the moment is furnished from Manchester, England, where he had advertised a performance of "Trovatore," with Ravelli and the inevitable and indispensable Dotti in the principal parts. For some reason Ravelli did not make his appearance. The audience began to show impatience and the outlook would have been serious for any other manager than Marpleson. There was a good deal of money in the house and he needed it all. His ready resourcefulness did not fail him. He stepped before the curtain looking as pleasing as the valet of a female seminary and said it had been a long time since he had sung "Mammi," and his voice, through the course of years, might have grown a little husky, but if they would indulge him he would see what he could do with the part rather than disappoint anybody. This was said in such blandness and good humor that the audience cheered and the colored order the procession to move forward. He managed to get along by having the key lowered somewhat, and was overwhelmed with shouts of applause. Those who know the colored can best appreciate this little incident.
